

Fiona is a Lecturer in Educational Leadership at Monash University. Her doctoral research was completed at the University of Melbourne in 2017 and investigated principal leadership in improving schools. Fiona worked for over 15 years in Victorian government primary schools and held leadership positions for much of this time. For the past nine years she has also worked as Senior Consulting Researcher – Director of Research in Innovative Professional Practice at Educational Transformations in Melbourne, Victoria. This role saw her lead and contribute to research projects that have investigated education systems, school effectiveness and school leadership across Australia and around the world. An investigation of system and community responses for students who have disengaged from schools was a particular area of interest.

Fiona is currently teaching leadership units in the Master of Education and Master of Leadership at Monash, and the Graduate Certificate in Principal Preparation (in partnership with Bastow Institute of Educational Leadership). She has previously taught educational leadership subjects at The University of Melbourne. Her research interests include: school and system leadership; school evaluation and improvement structures; school contextual influences (particularly concerning advantage differences and equity); schools supporting community cohesion; evidence-informed leadership; leadership development; and innovative approaches to student engagement. She presents regularly at Australian and international conferences and writes for academic journals on topics of educational leadership. Fiona also holds a Bachelor of Education (Hons), Graduate Certificate (Science Teaching) and Master of Education (Education Management).
